The plantation has a launching pad into Station Creek that feeds into the Saint Helena Sound and Atlantic Ocean. Secluded waters also provide an opportunity to harvest oysters, crabs, flounder and redfish.

The original plantation was 376 acres and a hub for shipping sea island cotton to Charleston, utilizing slave labor. One report says the plantation had 65 enslaved workers in 1790 and 25 in 1850. The same report noted the federal government purchased the plantation in 1863 as part of the Port Royal Experiment and the property was divided into tracts, "with much of the land being owned by the descendants of freed slaves until 1971."

"St. Helena Island was the epicenter of emancipation and Tombee was among the first to do so," the listing says. "Tombee home was kept by the government and used as an agricultural school to educate Freedmen. The 750+ square-foot basement of the grand home was a local 'juke joint' for the Gullah Geechee (community) for many years."

The residence is one of the few remaining Antebellum structures still standing in the Lowcountry today.

Nationally recognized restorer James Williams, whose life is documented in the book "Midnight in The Garden of Good and Evil" by John Berendt, purchased the property and began restoring the home to its "original grandeur" in the 1970s. This project and his efforts to restore other historic buildings was written about in Dorothy Williams Kingery's book "More Than Mercer House: Savannah's Jim Williams & His Southern Houses."

Years later the house was in need of repair and the current owners, who are also acclaimed restorers, completely renovated and restored it.

They "spared no expense modernizing and bringing back to life this special place," the listing says.
